May be a trifle hard on the cotton crop, but the man who has relegated cotton to the place of a side issue, and has invested in a SILO, doesn't need to worry about the slow maturing of cotton.

With a SILO on the farm, a fair crop of kafir, milo, feterita or even cane, and a hundred or so head of cattle to feed, Mr. Silo Man can go merrily along, running his own private meat manufacturing plant—constantly enriching his soil and marketing his grain or fodder on the hoof.

Oklahoma's long growing season makes it practical for the farmer to raise his early grain crop, and then devote his land to a forage crop, and the more silos he has, the more forage he raises and the more stock he feeds, the more will his land be enriched and prepared to grow the double crop, so the ultimate result will be that the more money he makes off his land, not only the richer will he become, but his land will increase in fertility in proportion.
